Research program:

Serics' main goal is to investigate how to create an agile and secure cyberspace by combining technological systems with strong and robust regulation, based on theories of human behavior. We envision an innovation ecosystem where experts in technology, law, ethics, sociology and education come together to create a process that, through a holistic perspective, can anticipate and test new cybersecurity policies. In particular, Serics will produce new knowledge on the regulatory, legal and ethical aspects of CyberSpace, classified into five macro categories. The first category concerns rights, rules, definitions, taxonomies and authorities aimed at creating new forms of co-regulation for cyberspace. The second category analyzes the legal and ethical issues for cybersecurity, such as the fundamental rights related to this new ecosystem. The third category includes models of lifelong learning and education on the legal issues of cybersecurity. The fourth category includes cybercrime and cyber diplomacy as important and crucial elements of a new national strategy. The fifth category includes digital sovereignty, also for calculations and technologies based on Artificial Intelligence, cloud, fog and edge computing, and their applications in specific sectors, such as those related to energy and transport.
